March 19, 2002 LB 1073A

creature was eight feet tall, but for some reason his face was so hideous that a person had difficulty looking at that face. He had dull, watery, yellow eyes; his lips were described as straight and black; the skin was barely sufficient to cover the nerves and the muscles of this creature. He did not know what he looked like originally. But when he came to life, and presented himself to his creator, his creator was shocked and may have fainted. The creature left and the next time we come in contact with him there has been a death. Frankenstein's name does not appear until about the 45th page in the book, depending upon which book you read it in. But there was a development of circumstances where this creature was treated so horribly by human beings who saw him that he changed from a benevolent person who wanted to be accepted by people, who wanted love, understanding, companionship, turned into a monster bent on revenge and concluded that if every person who was a human being was going to be cruel toward him and try to destroy him, why did he owe anything to human beings other than anger and revenge. He came to Frankenstein and told him that I, the monster,...

SENATOR COORDSEN: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...have committed horrible crimes, but there is a way that you can get me out of the companionship, out of the neighborhood, out of the sight of human beings. If you do what I ask you to do, you and no other human being will ever see me again. And what he wanted was a mate. He had gotten into a little cubbyhole building attached to a cottage and he looked through an opening and saw this family, how they conducted themselves. By watching and listening to them, he learned these languages, he learned how to read...and my light is on because I can't quite finish it yet.

SENATOR COORDSEN: Thank you. Senator Smith, please, on the A bill.

SENATOR SMITH: Thank you, Mr. President. Members, I do want to alert the body that in my polling of the amendments, I intended to state that I wanted those Select...or placed on Select File and those have been filed for Select File. So I just wanted the body to know that because I believe that this issue is far from
